GORDON GOLDWIN GLASS

To the Members of the Class of 1908:

This volume purports to be a compilation of statistics of our Class while in College, and its object is to bring you closer together by putting you in touch with the Class as a whole.

Perhaps the record of those three or four years may seem to you now, more than it will ten years hence, a story of “* * * Old, unhappy, far-off things,

And battles long ago.”

But it is was an epoch-making period for most of us, and I trust you will find this record of it not without some value.

That it is absolutely accurate I cannot hope, for there were during those years innumerable “far-off things” in progress, and countless “battles” fought, and the memory of them is as vague and intangible as if they had occurred in the time beyond which memory of man runneth not back, when there was no University Daily to record our achievements. For much of the accurate work herein our thanks are due to C. V. Imlay, '08, whose skilful and consistent effort has been of the greatest help to me in preparing this report.

It is almost impossible to reach every member of so large a Class. From this ideal, however, we have not departed, and 711 out of our total of 752 have been heard from. The delinquents will confer a great favor by falling into line. That you keep in constant communication with the Secretary is the chief request to be made in this preface—whether by post-card or letter, by newspaper clipping or wedding announcement, or even by telegram if the importance of the news seems to justify such means in the eye of the proud parent.

In this report distinction is made between degree holders and affiliated members of 1908, but as was said by Mr. Garrison in a former report, “as time goes on the chief distinction which will survive in the Class reports will be between those who answer the Secretary's notices and those who do not." Succeeding reports will contain chiefly revised lists of addresses and occupations, until the report of 1933 which will (D.V.) contain a minute tabulation of the achievements of every member of the Class up to that time—and may they be many and glorious!

Aside from reports, the Graduates' Magazine and the Bulletin are the official means of recording the doings of the Class; the news you send in will be printed in the Magazine and will be eagerly read.

The sudden death of the Treasurer, Carlton Apollonio, was a deep sorrow to the whole Class. His accounts were in perfect order, and D. S. Brigham, who was appointed by the Class Committee to fill the vacancy, found no difficulty in taking up the work. As is the usual precedent of the Classes, such vacancies are filled by the Class Committee at once, subject to the formal vote of the Class at the Commencement next following.

Thanks are due to the many friends who have cheerfully lent their aid in the preparation of this report. I wish especially to thank the College Office, the Library, the Rev. Prof. W. W. Fenn for his courtesy in supplying a correct version of the Baccalaureate Sermon, Mr. Wm. R. Thayer for his kindness in giving me the benefit of his expert knowledge of Class affairs, the editors of the CRIMSON for the use of their invaluable files, and the secretaries of clubs for supplying lists of members. Thanks are also especially due to the publishers, the Crimson Printing Company, for their careful attention to the details of the report.

I make this final appeal to you to keep me constantly posted as to your addresses, and to send in all the news about yourselves while it is news, so that our paragraph in the Graduate's Magazine may always cover at least a column,

Sincerely yours,

GUY EMERSON, Secretary.

BACCALAUREATE SERMON
TO THE CLASS OF 1908

BACCALAUREATE SERMON POSSESSIONS AND POSSIBILITIES.

BY WILLIAM WALLACE FENN.

“When the young man heard the saying, he went away sorrowful: for he was one that had great possessions.”

MT. 19, 22.

Sorrowful because he had great possessions, truly a strange reason for sorrow: men usually grieve not because they have but because they lack great possessions. And there is no reason to suppose that up to that moment his wealth had been to this young man anything but a source of legitimate satisfaction and honorable pride. For there was no baseness in him else could it not be written that Jesus, keen discerner of men as he was, that Jesus, beholding him, loved him. Not every young man of wealth would venture to say, least of all to Jesus as he did, and doubtless with entire sincerity, that he had kept all the commandments. Clean, ardent, dutiful, so far as he knew his duty, religious, a seeker after life eternal, he impresses us who read the story as he appears to have impressed Jesus at the time, as a young man of the very best sort. And yet a single sentence from the lips of Jesus, who loved him, completely changed his attitude towards himself and his possessions. He turned away not in anger, that also is to his credit, but sorrowful. And what was the saying which wrought so grievous a transformation?

It is a thousand pities that, in considering this incident, Christendom has fastened its attention not upon the essential but almost exclusively upon the accidental element in the requirement of Jesus. For the point of the command lies in the “Come, follow me,” and to part with his possessions was but a preliminary which in existing circumstances and in that particular instance happened to be necessary. For Jesus was consciously on his way to death, and plainly whoever would follow him then must be prepared to share his fate. If any man would come after me, he said, let him deny himself and take up his own cross (not figuratively, but literally), and follow me. As things stood, with such an outlook, how could one cling to his possessions and still be his friend and follower? It was to such intimate companionship that Jesus invited the young ruler, but acceptance of the invitation necessarily involved the loss of wealth, social standing, yea and probably of his own life also, and for so great a sacrifice the youth was not ready. It is not for us to pass harsh judgment upon him. Why should he renounce all, to follow this strange and suspected teacher with his motley band of disciples. None of the rulers, or Pharisees, believed on him, he was discredited by the religious leaders of the people, and only a few of those "who knew not the Law," Galilean fishermen, a publican, and the like, had cast in their lot with him. How could the young man have divined, either, the full extent of the possibilities which at that moment were opened before him. How could he have foreseen all that Jesus and his followers were to be and do in this human world. What would Jesus have made of this young man? We cannot tell, but we do know how much he made out of far less promising stuff, out of the very men whom probably this rich young ruler looked down upon with disdain. Yet out of such crude material, Jesus made men whom today the civilized world holds in undying honor. This noble ingenuous youth, whose name even has not been preserved, might be living today in the appreciative memory of mankind among those who shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars for ever and ever. Who could have guessed the splendid possibilities presented to this rich young man when, secure in wealth and honor, he looked into the eyes of a poor young man, distrusted and doomed, and hearing the summons to discipleship whose almost irresistible persuasions his own heart acknowledged, else would he have turned away in exasperated scorn rather than in sorrow, made the great refusal. His possessions stood in the way of his wondrous possibilities.

In this its essential characteristic the tragedy of that day in Palestine, for it was nothing less than a tragedy, has been enacted repeatedly in the history of mankind. Indeed, one is tempted to see in this young man a symbol of his own nation. No people had a richer inheritance of religious life and thought, but when its nobler possibilities, embodied in a group of young men of whom Jesus and Paul were chief, called it forward, its very possessions held it back. Unwilling, as its own son, the great Apostle, was willing, to count what things were gain unto it loss for Christ, it clung all the more tenaciously to its rich treasure already acquired while far less advanced peoples pressed into the place of spiritual leadership. And so it has often been. Humanity usually jumps its best on its forward way. Those who have fought a good fight and won a great victory pause to congratulate themselves and enjoy the fruit of their labors while others who have been their inferiors pass beyond them towards the greater triumphs that await. We say confidently that "the past at least is secure," and in a sense that is true, but in another sense the security of the past depends largely upon the fidelity of those to whose keeping the tradition of the past has been entrusted. Would Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, Faneuil Hall and the Old South Meeting-house, continue to stir the emotions they now excite if our national future should proclaim our fathers' mistaken and Democracy an impracticable ideal. Similarly the splendid past of Harvard depends, in some degree at least, upon its keeping ever in the van of educational advance. The abiding glory of past achievements calls for continued conquests. No nation or institution can consent to rest on its laurels without having its glory soon pass to another while the world mocks or pities, and I know not which is worse, the ghastly spectacle of imbecility bedecked with the withered ornaments of vanished power. To be satisfied with what we are, instead of pressing on to what we may become, is fatal. For possessions to check possibilities—that is tragedy.

Turning now to personal life, let us consider a few of the specific ways in which a man's possessions may stand in the way of his possibilities, beginning with one most directly suggested by the text. A man's wealth sometimes keeps him from fulfilling his highest possibilities. Necessity is frequently an indispensable spur to a man's powers. Dr. Hale relates that once, on an academic occasion here at Harvard, he congratulated Emerson upon the performance of a young man in whom both were deeply interested. Yes, replied Emerson, he is a fine fellow, and now if something will fall out amiss, if he should be unpopular with his class, or if his father should fail in business, or if some other misfortune should befall him, all will be well. It was a hard saying, and Dr. Hale confesses that at the time he was green enough to resent its apparent cynicism, but after all it was not unwise, for many a man of brilliant parts has made little of himself simply because he was never obliged to put forth all his powers. A man of means frequently fails just because of that fact to become a means for the highest ends. I remember a young lawyer, doing a prosperous business in a little Western city, of whom a sagacious friend once said regretfully that but for his comfortable practice which he dared not sacrifice he might become one of the great lawyers in Chicago. Because of their material possessions men often fail to reach out toward their possibilities.

And what shall one say to a young man of wealth whose possessions are thus in danger of blighting his possibilities? Shall he, like the youth in the story, be bidden sell all and give to the poor that so he may bring out all his possibilities under the urgency of need? It is not to be denied that now and then occasions arise when such a complete surrender is demanded. For, still, crises come in which Christ appears bearing the sword and demanding utter self-renunciation. No one here, almost in the shadow of Memorial Hall, can doubt it. But ordinarily the command comes in different form although with equal stringency. Usually, nowadays, the demand is that a man shall keep his possessions that he may give himself. There is a vast amount of work needing to be done in the world which is, and probably always will be, unremunerative and which on that account offers an attractive opportunity to young men of wealth. One hesitates to be specific at this point, for there are intricate economic questions involved, but one or two suggestions may be worth considering. Several years ago there appeared in one of the magazines a character sketch of Theodore Roosevelt, in which, when asked what he would say to the young men of New York if he could speak convincingly to them. Mr. Roosevelt replied: "I would order them to work, I would try to develop and work out an idea of mine, the theory of the duty of the leisure classes of the community. I'd like to teach the young man of wealth that he who has not wealth owes his first duty to his family, but he who has means owes his first duty to the State. I would preach the doctrine of work to all, and to the young man of wealth the doctrine of unremunerative work." About the wisdom of this I am not competent to speak, although it sounds sensible, but I do know that there is a multitude of tasks of scholarship which await interested students who can give themselves to unrequited labor. How one wishes that such young men could hear and obey the persuasive voice of Scholarship summoning them to these unrecompensed tasks in which they would find development of their powers, and substantial satisfaction, not merely in being of genuine service but also in the joy of the work itself. For Prescott was right that there are few joys in life to be compared with sustained interest in some intellectual pursuit. Yet young men of wealth often miss this gladness and fall far short of their possibilities, because their possessions encourage laziness. Keep your possessions that you may give yourself in the numberless unremunerative ways now open in scholarship, philanthropy and public service—that is the present summons. Can a man really retain his self-respect who is not doing some productive work? Why is an able bodied man less a beggar if he live off the labor of his ancestors, than if he live off the labor of his contemporaries?

Again, it often happens that a man's wealth spoils his possibilities of deep and diversified friendships. For believe me it is among workers and never among idlers that true friendships are formed. Men who dawdle about their clubs can never know the choice and enduring friendships which arise among men who labor and sacrifice together for a common cause. Friendships are for fighters not for loafers. The longer I live, the more convinced I become that the worth of a career consists very largely in the friendships it enables one to form, and many a man of wealth never knows, and never can know unless he joins the ranks of the workers, the staunch and rewarding friendships of life. Moreover, such men, if they do manage to have friendships of a sort, are usually debarred from intimacy with any outside their own set. They never learn the worth of men whose "hoard is little, but whose hearts are great." It is good to touch elbows with the rank and file, to have friends among the poor and unlearned, though one must be of fine mold to win and keep such friendships. One of the greatest disadvantages of wealth is that it often keeps a man from deep and diversified friendships which are among the supreme blessings of life.

But there are other possessions than those of money which interfere with a man's possibilities, and let us think next of intellectual possessions. On Commencement Day you are to be welcomed to the fellowship of educated men, and deservedly, for you have learned much during your college years, but there are ways—I shall speak only of three—in which intellectual possessions may prevent the fulfillment of intellectual possibilities.

First, then, many men of exceptional intellectual endowments waste themselves and their abilities just because of their great possessions. As boys in school they never worked half so hard as their companions, and yet their work was better as well as more easily done. They seemed to get at things intuitively instead of by hard laborious plodding. They picked up lightly, and as it were from the surface, treasures for which their fellows had to delve long and deep. In college and in professional life, they showed similar aptitude: but have you never seen one of these brilliant men come up to a difficulty and baulk at it dreading the drudgery it entails? He cannot bear to collect statistics, to amass and weigh facts, to make laborious experiments, to bear down hard with his mind on a difficult problem, all that is for the pack-horses of learning while his unbridled Pegasus revels in the skies. So a brilliant guess does duty for a careful investigation, a fascinating generalization is proposed as an established principle. It is often these brilliant men who like wandering fires lead Society into dangerous bogs by displaying their plausible and shining notions upon subjects concerning which they have earned no right to have any opinion at all. Oh, these brilliant men! Sometimes we know as little how to get on with them as without them. But to men of such great mental possessions, soon or late appears the austere figure of Truth, saying—Lay aside your tawdry theories, have done with your gaudy generalizations, harness all these powers for arduous research, that you may realize to the full your possibilities of usefulness. And when that call comes, alas for the man who makes the great refusal—he too has sacrificed his possibilities to his possessions. For the man of brilliant parts may enjoy too well his snap-judgments and flashy opinions, and dislike to abandon the pleasure and notoriety his wit gives him, that he may walk in the paths where alone wisdom is to be found. His possessions have ruined his possibilities, for it is wisdom and not wit which really saves the world and which the world permanently honors.

Again, a man's academic possessions interfere with his possibilities when they are accompanied, as they sometimes unfortunately are, by academic snobbishness. A great deal has been said about the conceit of college-trained men, and most of it is arrant nonsense, quite untrue to the fact. Very few college graduates think they know it all—the recollection of their grades is enough to disabuse them of such a delusion—but there is often a superstition that only academic persons can teach them anything. Nevertheless wisdom is won by the discipline of life as truly as by the discipline of the schools and many a young college graduate has learned by bitter experience that he cannot afford to despise the judgment of men with less book-learning but greater life-wisdom. If what you have learned here has begotten prejudices which lead you to disregard supereciliously the opinions of intelligent men, poor in the lore of books, but rich in experience, if your academic training produces academic snobbishness, you may indeed find your intellectual possessions hostile to your possibilities. A man who has read few books may have intelligence which one who has read many books lacks, and after all intelligence is the thing.

And this brings me to the third way in which a man's intellectual possessions may be injurious to his mental possibilities. You have learned here facts and their interpretations. Now it may safely be said that the information you have received has been accurate and trustworthy. And the knowledge thus acquired is precious. It has become the fashion to disparage what is described as "shovelling facts into a youthful mind," and to praise education of the faculties as against "mere instruction." But the scorn is ill-advised and the disparagement is dangerous. The knowledge of facts is important and information is valuable. The facts will stand but their interpretations will change. No one who has taught you here will claim finality for his theories, and the emphasis upon mental training is designed to enable one so to deal with facts, new and old, as to shape them into truer theories. But it is one of the most trying experiences of a scholar to become aware that his system must be shattered in order that a truer and more comprehensive theory may be constructed. There is therefore, naturally, an academic conservatism, a clinging to established order and attained system which is perilous and may become harmful. Here indeed is the queer paradox of education. The primary function of mind is to effect prompt and adequate adjustment to new situations, hence the training of mind would seem to require that the powers be made more flexible and supple. But mental discipline, as the very term suggests, almost inevitably imparts a certain formalism and rigidity. Hence it often happens that a trained man, who is highly efficient in his own field, is weak outside of it, and that his very education makes him incapable of meeting new situations. Herein lies all the justification there is for the frequent charge that college men are too seldom among the pioneers in reform. Your greatest mental acquisitions here will prove to be a method rather than a system, an attitude towards life, an openness of mind, a promptness of the mental powers in face of new situations, and a profound reverence for the facts of the case, but if you allow what has been taught you here to harden into formulas against which Carlyle so furiously raged, your very possessions may ruin your possibilities and you and your thought may become obstacles in the way of advancing knowledge.

So much, then, for illustrations of the thought that man's justly cherished possessions may mar his higher possibilities of development and usefulness. But one question remains. Is it not true that in this highly specialized world a man who hopes to accomplish anything must necessarily renounce many of his possibilities? Yes, that is certainly true. One of the most painful experiences is for a man to hear all about him the shutting of doors leading into avenues of thought and occupation which persuasively invite him. He has chosen his path in life and along that he must travel. His interests almost unavoidably contract, he cannot leave the main line of his pursuit to wander off into devious ways, however alluring. But while engrossment in a chosen task does preclude the possibility of comprehensive self-development and activity, it is nevertheless true that if life is to be kept wholesome and happy the sense of a wide horizon must not be lost. However narrow a man's lot may be, its narrowness is not fatal unless he ceases to realize how narrow it is and that about him is a world full of human interests, all of them as significant and worthful as his own, and that in this great struggling toiling whole his life has its place and function. And it is just that sense of the wholeness of life including all our fragmentary individual interests and pursuits which is of the essence of religion. It is no longer necessary to proclaim that religion does not consist in acceptance of dogma or compliance with ritual, that fight has been won, for our generation at any rate. But in its place has come a tendency to identify religion with practical activity, with social service, with good works in general, which is nearly as partial as the tendency it has supplanted. The ancient prophet summed up religion in doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with God, and we must beware of so emphasizing the first two points as to leave the third obscure. To walk humbly with God, to have such a sense of the wondrous and transcendent unity of life as fills one with awed humility, to realize that in this unity his little life and work have place and that the spirit of the whole is working in him and through him, to ends grander than he dreams, this is, and ever will be, essential in religion. And hence it is that religion brings salvation from narrowness. This Chapel does not stand for religion as but one of the many interests of this place, as, so to speak, only one stone in a massive wall, rather it stands for religion as the keystone of the arch giving strength to all and receiving from all. And you will permit me to say that men who have neglected this Chapel during their college course, who now perhaps for the first time see the inside of its walls, have lost much which might have been gained during the four years. For in these days of high specialization religion has become indispensable to the worker with hands or brain, just because it does mean that sense of a wide horizon which redeems one from littleness and pettiness by keeping alive the sense of vast possibilities, while it also braces him for his chosen task. A man's practical interests and effective activity represent only an infinitesimal are on the vast circumference of human experience, but the function of religion is to place him at the center of life where the sense of full-orbed existence is never lost. And hence it is that today I venture to plead with you educated men not to neglect in the future, if you have in the past, the religious life, and to that end to associate yourself with the Christian Church. It is hardly necessary to say that a man can be religious apart from the church, or to deny the truth of a current prejudice against it. I know how often in the past the Church has been guilty of clinging to its possessions, material and spiritual, to the denial of its possibilities, and it may fairly be urged that it is in danger of making that great mistake today, nevertheless for that very reason college men ought to cast in their lot with it, that blind adherence to its rich possessions may be overcome, and the possessions themselves perpetuated, through the larger fulfillment of its present possibilities. Indeed it has often seemed to me inexplicable that men wishing to serve society in the most effective way do not comprehend the vantage ground which the Church gives them with its noble investment of inspiring tradition which influences the very sources of thought and conduct, but the chief point I would urge today is that the Church does stand as the one institution of religion, and that religion is the principal means by which man feels himself part of a larger life in which all his possibilities are preserved to keep pure and wholesome his enlarging possessions. I can say this here with perfect freedom for on this occasion and from this pulpit no one can be even suspected of speaking in the interest of any particular church or sect, and I must say to you, young men, with perfect frankness and sincerity, that for your own sake and for the sake of the Society in which you would be most highly useful members, you ought to ally yourselves with the Christian Church.

Where could one find a more conspicuous illustration of the potency of religion in the life of a man than in the scene which has suggested our thought this afternoon. What were the apparent possessions of Jesus compared with those of the rich young ruler whom he loved, and whose friendship he craved so earnestly that we may well believe he turned away with a sadness far deeper than was his who made the great refusal. All his life long the carpenter of Nazareth had known only the very humblest surroundings; born and nurtured in comparative poverty, he had prayed and toiled for his daily bread. "How knoweth this man letters never having learned?" was contemptuously said of him by those who knew that he was no man of the schools. I spoke of the friendship of humble men and of the wisdom they have to impart, and here is a humble man, destitute even of such formal education as his age and land afforded, to whose simple words the wisest men have listened in the past, and are listening today with increasing reverence and confidence. It is no exaggeration to say that he has been the most influential figure in the whole history of mankind, and his influence seems likely to increase, rather than diminish, with the growing conviction that he had really found the way of honorable and satisfying life, that his standard of values was everlastingly right and that the spirit which possessed him was the spirit which must possess every man who would live usefully and well. And this humble man has become the great teacher of mankind because of his religion: it was his religion, nothing more, nothing less, which made Jesus of Nazareth what he has become in the history of our race. In his carpenter shop and in all the narrowness and pettiness of the village life of Palestine, he had become sensible of the ever-present environment of God, and entered into the spirit which is the life of all. He had penetrated to the very center and heart of things, by winning the eternal spirit and acknowledging the supremacy of eternal values. He could have taught the young ruler, he can teach us after the lapse of centuries, how to win the life eternal. And if your possessions, of whatever sort they may be, keep you from hearing and obeying his present call to loyal discipleship, the tragedy of the text will be repeated in your life and your noblest possibilities will be sacrificed. Do not imagine that I say this just because I am a Christian minister: on the contrary, I am a Christian minister just because I believe with all my heart that a man can have no nobler ambition than, in the words of John Stuart Mill, "so to live that Christ would approve of his life." There is no higher type of manhood, there is no better, more useful, more satisfying way of life; there is no greater joy, than to be at one in spirit and purpose with him and with the great company of loyal and loving souls who gratefully acknowledge his inspiration and guidance, and to set before ourselves any other ideal is to be faithless to our grandest possibilities.

BACCALAUREATE HYMN

RUDOLPH ALTROCCHI.

(Tune: Benediction.)

The golden hours of mirth are fading fast
Behind us lie the visions of our youth,
We face the portals of the world at last,
Eager to seek with toil the greater truth.

Now while the echoes of our happiest years
Make sad the happy hours of this last day,
Our hearts aglow with thankfulness that cheers,
Brothers in hope, let us now join to pray.

And let our voices rise to this one prayer.
That scorning lives of ease we may receive
Power to toil, and courage all to dare
And strength at last to conquer and achieve.

HENRY ROBINSON SHIPHERD.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, AND CLASSMATES OF 1908:—

Fellowship is known to us by various names, but the one by which we classmates know it best is class-spirit. This is the word I want to start with, for it is a word that has for all of us a very fine and a very great significance. It is a word that suggests to us, and always will suggest to us, the splendid esprit de corps that has compacted into an indissoluble unit more than half a thousand men from every condition in life and from Bulgaria and Maine to Hawaii and Japan. We are glad to recall to-day whatever we have done to make this feeling of kinship close and strong; we are glad to remember that we have done much, yet we are wishful that we had done more. And we are very sure that our longest and happiest memories will follow back to beginnings that were set in motion by the kinship of these four years.

This would now be the conventionally appropriate place to emphasize the difference between life in college and life afterward; but I believe there may be quite as much significance in their likeness. It is possible to exaggerate this matter of the differences, and to lose thereby the sense of likeness, which I believe quite as true and no less important. No one does expect to find everything the same; but no one should expect to find everything different.

For if we have discovered here that doubtless God could have made a worse thing than a snob, but doubtless God never did, we may depend upon it that the differences in the bigger world around us will serve only to make this fact a more persistent one. If we have been so fortunate as to discover here that the stuff inside a man makes more difference to him and to us than the stuff outside of him, we have learned a formula that we shall never get through using. If we have learned here that in a real handshake man meets man at par, we have mastered a social accomplishment that will stand us in better stead than many graces acquired in tea-drinking and bridge. For the difference will be, much less of the tea and the bridge, and much more of the world's real work, alongside men with the bark on figuratively and literally,—men who are too busy building the wonders of the world to be over-thoughtful of the niceties of parlor etiquette; and such differences as these will but carry deeper, into the very roots of our lives, the fundamental facts about men and things that abide, and that we have begun to learn here.

For after all, what is this place if it is not a training-school for men? Why are we going to value its stamp upon us—because that stamp declares us trained chemists, trained engineers, trained litterateurs, or trained men? A scholar who is not as much man as scholar, is by just so much less valuable and useful than he should be. Why do we have athletics? Because we are boys in training to be men, and athletics work out better than anything else we know the play that we need as boys and the stuff that we're going to need as men. The athlete may suppose it's all play, and some of his elders may refuse to believe it can be anything else; yet nevertheless, there is that in athletic contest which reveals and makes the stamina of manhood. This is why athletics will remain.

When this athletic training balances and complements such intellectual training as this University affords, the possibilities of these four years in the making of men become limitless. For in carrying a long mental task through drudgery to its outcome we get stamina and grit that is less spectacular in the getting.—perhaps.—than athletic power, but that is quite as manly, likely to be quite as useful, and surely, for thinking beings no less rational.

What has all this to do with fellowship? Just this. Fellowship is the art of meeting and knowing men, first taken up in earnest here where men are in the making. The two go together; if they did not, a college education were not worth while. If we have not learned to know and hate a snob wherever we find him,—especially if he uses our own visiting-cards; if we have not sloughed off the blinders of the provincial, and learned how to get at the other man in spite of our own mannerism,—we have wasted time, even though we get our parchment “magna cum,” with distinction in every subject from botany to divinity. And if we have learned to recognize and stimulate what is square and straight and sound and strong in men, whether it has come out on Soldiers Field or in Sever Hall or not particularly anywhere,—if we have so sharpened our sense of the unseen that we can find the manhood and call it out in men where others have failed to, we have made our coming here worth while, whatever else we may have done or failed to do.

Men of 1908, it is our business to take the best we have here learned of fellowship and try it on the world. The world is a big place; but it is only just big enough for men of personality, of conviction, of power. If we want to succeed as men, the essence of fellowship must pervade all our work and play; for we and those about us, near and far, are mutually dependent upon each other, and it is the spirit of fellowship alone that makes such a state of things not only endurable, but desirable. But we must do more than succeed as individuals. We have responsibilities laid upon us that will not be discharged by narrow, private successes. We are no longer nondescript individuals from anywhere; we are Harvard men, and the quality of our achievement as well as the quantity must show this. Not one of us can ever afford to forget for a moment the name that is upon him; for in the eyes of the men and women about him Harvard will represent what he represents. And if we go out from this place a great unit for fellowship as we have been here a great unit for class-spirit, and meet our fellows everywhere as fairly, as honestly, as manfully, as they have a right to expect of us, we may win the right to come back unashamed, for we shall do much to help in making the name of our Harvard truly great.

CLASS POEM

JOHN HALL WHEELOCK.

I.

Now in the east the morning dies,
The full light of the splendid sun
Strikes downward on our lifted eyes
And the long journey is begun.
Across the shattered walls
A voice prophetic calls,
With tumult and with laughter
We rise and follow after.

II.

The modern world, immense and wide,
Awaits us, huger than before,
With new stars swimming in the void
And Science broadening evermore
The sweep of the limitless Vast,
The Past is dead and past;
Yet through it all forever
One voice is silent never.

III.

'Mid iron wheels and planets whirled
The clangor city, in the street,
—The machinery of the modern world—
His lips cry loudly and entreat;
Like one that lifts his head
For a second time from the dead,
—Out of the Church's prison,
The new Christ re-arisen!

CLASS POEM

IV.

O holy spirit—O heart of man !
Will you not listen, turn and bow
To that clear voice, since time began
Loud in your ears, and louder now !
Mankind, the Christ, retired—
Recrowned, reerucified ;
No god for a gift God gave us,
Mankind alone must save us.

V.

Will you not hear him—reach your hand !—
From factory, tenement and slum
His voice pleads vainly in the land,
Ah, heart of man, the time has come !
The voice of Cain that wailed
Grew sorrowful and failed,
But a new voice rings deeper,
“You are your brother’s keeper.”

VI.

O world, grown pitiless and grim !
O world of men, had you but known
Your brother is your Christ, through him
You must be saved and him alone !
Love for his sorrows—love
Alone can lift you above
The pain of your misgiving,
The doom and the horror of living.

VII.

Within ourselves we must find the light
And in ourselves our gods to-be,
Not throned beyond the stars of night ;
Here in America we must see
The love of man for man,
The new world republican,—
A heaven, not superhuman,
Reborn in man and woman.

HARVARD, 1908 — CLASS REPORT

VIII.

Forward—truth glorifies not kills
The ancient marvel of the soul,
Each new progression but fulfills
That wonder,—the wheels of the world that roll
Thundering, but proclaim
God with a louder name;
Science revealing rehearses
But vaster universes.

IX.

Though the dark veil of dusk and doom
You strip from off the soul of things,
Though with new torches through the gloom
You hunt Him on untiring wings,
And in the starry space,
You shall not find His face;
A voice comes following after
Out of the dust with laughter.

IX.

The Vision—the Ideal—the God—
Not anything ever may destroy,
Then let us follow, winged and shod
With love, with courage and with joy;
Herein alone is the truth,
The glory and fire of youth,
Herein all high endeavor,
Forever and forever!

IVY ORATION

KENNETH GREELEY CARPENTER

Pieces of eight. Pieces of ninety-eight. Merry Widows, in fact. Brethren:—by Brethren all of you are included—from Graduates to sub-Freshmen, from grandmothers to even grander daughters. By brethren we mean gentlemen, and by brethren we also mean gentle ladies. Does not brethren signify both the men and the ladies? Surely the one embraces the other!

But this is all so sudden! If I had only had a suspicion that I should be called upon to-day a few words would have been in readiness. Already you are rising before me in tiers! —except the Graduates who get in on the ground floor. You really should not have called on me. Mr. First Marshal, because you know whenever I am called upon to speak I am liable to get right up and prattle away. Is it fair to call for a speech upon such short notice? On the way down here a few moments ago the First Marshal asked me if I had my speech, and I said “What speech?” He then asked me if I had not read in the Crimson last December that I was to speak in the Stadium. I said, “At times I read that paper, but somehow I must have missed the number referred to, probably because of my haste to get to Chapel before all the seats were taken.” “Never mind,” said he, “just get up and tell them that and they will think you are joking.”

What have we here? The Stadium exercises! Certainly it does. See the effect of its annual physical exertions. This jerks us to the athletic situation. If any doubt my word they may apply Professor Minister Bug’s Ananiascope. It seems almost inhumane when we read in the paper that “at three this afternoon the Senior shooting team will shoot the Juniors.” Tennis, of course, is played in the best courts of Europe, America and Cambridge. Lacrosse as its name implies is not straightforward. Like the Alpine edelweiss it gains its best foothold in passes. Rowing is another gentle sport which should be maintained, because it combines versatility of action with quick thinking, and, furthermore, it is a sport in which a sport can continue to sport, no matter what his age. The only rough element in rowing is the water. Swimming is the cleanest of all sports. It is highly approved of by the Corporation, which has voted to put fish on the free list at Memorial. The most successful athletics, however, are those of the more brutal sort. Already next fall's diabolo team has begun its training table at Memorial. Some of the best diabolo experts in this country have been found among our Radcliffe spinsters. Do our English cousins gather my trend. The "Twenty-Question" team has a very good guessing game called "Boylston Bridge is Falling Down." In recent practice matches the first team has usually scored before the fifteenth question. The Puss in the Corner team has lately been doing some very clever corner work. None of the Varsity corners will be lost by graduation. Our cheering at games is noteworthy. Do you know that our best rooters come from the Arnold Arboretum? Another good squad of rooters are the squirrels in the Yard. Don't call our Yard a campus! To remember this bear in mind that annually one Yard tree is cut down to keep up the supply of the world's Yardsticks. Year after year as we walk across the Yard in March we find the Yard sticks.

Perhaps a history of the class would be proper—at least let us hope so. Over two hundred years ago the class of 1908 was scheduled to arrive in September, 1904. Despite the antiquity of this schedule we arrived exactly on time. As Freshmen, we feared to make even as much noise as a couple of communicating rooms. Looking back upon older classes 1908 has been in the position of the little girl who said "Mother, did God make Aunt Lucy"? "Yes." "Well, did God make me"? "Yes, why do you ask"? "Well, I just thought he'd been doin' lots better work lately."

"Class Lives" are questionable things. It looked as if wholesale murder had been committed from the number of Class Lives which were lost this spring, but we easily got new lives, and so it would seem that we have discovered the secret of immortality. The questions which one answers to enter College are severe, thus, "What is your age?" "Why"? "Did you ever think of going to Yale"? "What were the inducements"? "What was your great grandmother's maiden name? Answer in English." We thought these were difficult, but to get out of College and receive the A.B. Amphibious Bankrupt, you must pass a successful Class Life. Not until last January did we realize that the real purpose of our College careers was to provide answers to these lively questions. Some of the questions are: "What courses have you taken—mistaken"? "Did you belong to the Union"? "If not, did you go there regularly"?

To return to our history! 'Tis said that history never repeats itself, but our Freshman history fairly stutters with victories. We have winning down to such a fine point that in football the victory habit has taken to making itself manifest in the form of a reflex action. And speaking of Freshmen, before I forget it, the last number on the program to-day will be the singing of "Fair Harvard" written by Gilman, '11—a Freshman—just one hundred years ago.

Last autumn came the John Harvard celebration. It made John turn in his grave—yes—it made him spin. John, three hundred years ago, was born the son of the village butcher, so it was natural for him to be keen on cutting up. In fact, he was killing. He made no bones about coming to this country, because it was meet for him to do so. And now see what he is responsible for! He is the cause of your being here to-day. If you do not enjoy yourself, blame him; if you eat your tickets and put ice cream in your pocket, blame him; if it rains, blame him; if you are glad you came, thank us. That's all right. We were just on the point of mailing you an invitation when your request came for a couple of dozen tickets.

The life around Harvard Square is always interesting. There is the transfer man. Do not mistake and think he is giving out degrees—'tis merely Lampoon corporation stock—the laughing stock of the College. Then, too, there is always the old lady who asks where the custodian of the Fogg Art Museum is to be found, and we tell her "he is inside; the one with the clothes on." Then she asks if the glass flowers are out, and we say "No, but the Washington Elm is spreading to-day." The great difficulty in finding the Washington Elm gave rise to the term "slippery elm." None of us have ever been able to determine why this noble tree was planted so near the street car tracks. Our Natural History Society has long studied a peculiarly effective call which is manifested usually along Mount Auburn Street. It is a forceful note: we know it as the "Office Call." John Burroughs, whom it long baffled, declares it to be the original "Call of the Wild." In the whole University there are many departments, each with a faculty for doing its work, but probably the best plant will be found at the Bussey Institute. The few who attend it, however, are only common, or garden students.

The Cambridge banks have decided that undergraduates keep an average balance of less than nothing. Their loss on this score is credited to "Harvard Indifference." Why, the end of our first year we were using money which was supposed to take us through Senior year; Sophomore year we used up our Law School allowance; and recently we have been consuming our younger brother's hopes of an education, because, of course, he will be more respected if he works his way through College.

To-day we are spreading ourselves. To-morrow we shall be shrinking from creditor eaters. We are quite unsettled as to our minds, and more so as to our bills. Gazing upon the hard—aye, the macadam road of the future, we feel as well fitted for it as a tonneau without a chassis, with a steep hill ahead of it. For this special day we have been practising at length. During May we wore these caps and gowns daily until one o'clock. Our gowns being black, we rehearsed in them only during the mourning hours. Thus arrayed in our-morning glory we have been on many a little trip and tear. The goodies, the copy-eats, have also been wearing caps and gowns of late.

IVY ORATION

Having told you in detail all that can be said about each individual in the class, I trust you will not object if I am still more specific.

The choosing of courses has been one of our greatest difficulties. At all times we were supposed to carry at least four courses, but lucky was the man who could carry even one, and drag two more, without dropping the fourth. Choosing courses is like—in fact, it is—plucking a dinner from a bill of fare. There is so much one would like to eat, and yet so little that he really cares to digest. Some courses are hearty meals, while others, like Music 3 and Mining 16, are mere relishes, to which, in passing, we give but little attention. There is Latin 10 and French 1a. Shall we take German 2b or not 2b; that is the question.

Whether 'tis better as a sport to suffer
The awful risk of flunking with an E,
Or take some other monstrous course of troubles
And by tutoring pass it. To cut; to cram;
No Gore. With what half course, oh, let us end
The headache and the thousand college shocks
That we are heir to? To cut; to cram;
To Cram, perchance to Moore; aye there's the cub.
For in the list of courses there may come
A four o'clock on Saturday mayhaps,
To grunt and swear under a weary course,
Called seventeen or twenty-one perhaps,
Is in itself a thought unhappy most.
Thus conscience does make loafers of us all.

CLASS ODE

JOSEPH BIEGLER HUSBAND

'Tis the day of our parting, fair mother we go
Proud and firm in the strength of our youth;
We are girt for the fight with thy armor of light;
We march forth with thy watchword of Truth.
Our lives are before us, we know not the end;
But proud of thy name which we bear,
We go out to the conflict, exulting and free,
With a spirit unbroken by fear.

In the years that must come we will often return
Till our army has melted away;
With laughter and tears we will gather again,
Some mighty, some weary, some gay.
But whatever the fate that awaits us beyond,
Though we wander for years from thy side,
Fair Harvard, thy name will be ever our gleam,
And thy motto forever our gide.

DISQUISITIONS COMMENCEMENT DAY.

CHARLES RHIND JOY

The second Tuesday of August, 1642, was a most auspicious day in the history of Harvard College. It was Harvard's first commencement day. The graduating class, composed of nine members, had passed successfully through the first four years in the life of the infant institution, and now presented themselves as candidates for the coveted degree. The occasion excited great interest in the whole community, and we learn from a letter written to England at the time that "the governor, magistrates, and ministers from all parts, with all sorts of scholars and others in great numbers were present and did hear their exercises." The exercises were held in Latin and when these were ended, the candidates were presented to the magistrates and ministers, who found them "worthy of the first degree (commonly called bachelor) pro more Academiarum in Anglia." After being thus approved, the candidates were formally admitted to the degree by the president and a "book of arts" was placed in the hands of each, with power "to read lectures in the hall upon any of the arts, when they should be thereunto called, and a liberty of studying in the library." The awarding of degrees closed the exercises of the day and all dispersed in a dignified manner.

These simple and unpretentious exercises were repeated in all the early commencements. Before 1700, however, the custom of a public display and parade on commencement day was introduced. The governor of the province was escorted by his body-guard, by way of Roxbury and Brighton, to Cambridge, reaching the college about ten o'clock in the morning. A procession was then formed in front of Harvard

Hall, which proceeded to the Second Meeting House, where exercises were held much as they are held to-day. The morning program was followed by dinner at Harvard Hall, and the procession then returned to the church and listened to the masters' disputations, the president's address, and the valedictory. Finally the officers and guests were escorted by the students to the president's house, where the students dispersed and the ceremonies came to an end.

This is the official side of the early commencement. But there is another phase of the day's exercises which is quite as interesting. The students very soon took advantage of the occasion to celebrate in their own way and they caused the authorities no end of trouble by what were considered their wild revels. In 1693, the corporation passed the following vote: "Having been informed that the custom taken up in the college, not used in any other Universities, for the commencers to have plum-cake, is dishonorable to the College, not grateful to wise men, and chargeable to the parents of the commencers, [the Corporation] do therefore put an end to that custom, and do hereby order that no commencer, or other scholar, shall have any such cakes in their studies or chambers; and that if any scholar shall offend therein, the cakes shall be taken from him, and he shall moreover pay to the College twenty shillings for each such offence." It is not known what was especially harmful in plum-cake, nor is it known what happened to the cakes when confiscated by the tutors, but at any rate the prohibition was evidently unsuccessful, for the vote was reiterated in 1722, and the question was again revived in 1727, when the decree was refused to any student who should "presume to do anything contrary to the act of 1722, or go about to evade it by plain cake." In the meantime, police had to be employed for several days and nights to control the students, and so unmanageable did they become that in 1727 the corporation voted that the occasion be "more private than has been usual." The day of commencement was changed from Wednesday to Friday, so that "there might be less remaining time of the week spent in frolicing," and the corporation also voted to conceal the date of the celebration until just before it should occur. An immediate outcry arose. The clergy protested against holding commencement on Friday because those of them who lived at a distance were hindered from returning in time for Sunday, and both the clergy and the laity protested against privacy because they celebrated the occasion as a general holiday. The result was that both votes were rescinded in 1736 and from that time on the day was fixed as Wednesday and the date was published long beforehand.

Nothing daunted by the fact that their first efforts to secure order were thus thwarted by public sentiment, the corporation of the college began to try other methods. But the celebration seemed to be passing beyond their control. Commencement day was fast being transformed into a great public holiday, and during the whole of commencement week the common was covered with booths in long lines like streets, which dispensed the refreshments and entertainments of a fair to the crowds that came. Great disturbance often resulted, so that the lieutenant-governor of the province was finally asked by the president of the college "to prohibit the setting up of booths and tents on those public days," but these efforts had little success. Meanwhile a new sort of grievance arose. The practice of "unsuitable and unseasonable dancing" came to the sorrow of the "honorable governors," and such immoralities rapidly increased until a committee had to be appointed to examine matters. The committee reported that the college was "in a weak and declining state" throughout, and recommended that vigorous rules and severe penalties be adopted. Their advice was followed, but even then the disgraceful scenes in the afternoon and evening of commencement day continued. Finally when the collegiate authority had proved unable to cope with the evil, an appeal was made to parental authority. In 1749, the corporation recommended to parents that "considering the awful judgments of God upon this land, they retrench commencement expenses, so as may best correspond with the frowns of Divine Providence, and that they take effectual care to have their sons' chambers cleared of company and their entertainments finished on the evening of said commencement day, or at furthest, by next morning," and in 1760 the corporation themselves voted that all unnecessary expenses and dancing in the Hall or other college building in commencement week be forbidden.

It seems to have been fated, however, that as soon as disturbance had been quelled in one place it should break out in another. Hitherto, the exercises in the morning had been sober enough, but now to the utter horror of all, three of the commencement parts in a single year attacked the orthodox principles for which the institution stood. Every one was grievously shocked at this gross Arianism, and thereafter it became the president's duty to see that all parts were orthodox and seemly, and incidentally he was enjoined "to put an end to the practice of addressing the female sex."

After the Revolution, the gaiety continued to increase, and so also did the efforts of the corporation to repress the effervescent spirits of the students. Innovations were being made at the same time in the character of the commencement parts. In 1763 the first oration in English was given, in 1813 an oration in French, and in 1818 an oration in Spanish. Gradually English predominated in the exercises. Music was employed from the very first, though not always to the satisfaction of the auditors, as we learn from the diary of Rev. John Pierce, who says in 1806, "the theatrical music with which the exercises were interspersed was highly disgusting to the more solid part of the audience," and neither was it always employed successfully, for we learn from the same place that in 1831 the psalm "was pitched too high." By degrees, however, the exercises assumed the form they have to-day.

The fair on the common continued through the first quarter of the 19th century, for Prof. Andrew Preston Peabody says that he never heard "such a horrid din, tumult, and jargon of oath, shout, scream, fiddle, quarrelling, and drunkenness" as took place there on the evening of commencement day and the night following in 1825. But in 1828, for the first time in many years, no tents were allowed on the common, and from that time on students and friends have gradually united in a more orderly and at the same time more pleasant celebration of the day. At the middle of the 19th century, the character of commencement was permanently changed. Class day became the gala day for the visitors and friends, and commencement day was more and more reserved for seniors and graduates.

The story of commencement forms a most interesting chapter in the life of the university. It is a story of growth and change, but the commencement of to-day is not wholly different from that of 1642, for many of the old ceremonies and traditions are yet preserved as they were years ago. And in its vital and enduring significance, the day has never changed. In this respect, the commencement of 1908 is still the commencement of 1642.

LITERATURE AND LIFE.

HENRY ROBINSON SHIPHERD

We hear much in these days of prolific criticism about the closeness of literature and life; but usually, I believe, these discussions stop some distance short of the truth. For literature and life are not two things—literature is life.

By life I mean (to use Stevenson's phrase) not the "Permanent Possibility of Sensation," but living: the real thinking, feeling, hoping that we are actually about. What "life" is none of us knows, and what the "Permanent Possibility of Sensation" is few of us care. But living is what we are all so busy with that nothing else in the whole system of things really gets our attention except as it promises or threatens to mix itself up with our actual business of living. This keeps us so busy, indeed, that one moment at a time is quite all we can manage; that is, it is the present moment alone that at any given instant constitutes living, that is, life. The future has no concern for us except as it bids fair to become the present: and the past, however splendid it may have been when it had its turn as the present, is utterly gone for us except as we are able to bring it back and substitute it for the present that has succeeded it. This power of substitution—of displacing the regular present—is the significant point here; it is universal and instinctive; it becomes the function of imagination when the future is concerned, of the memory when the past is concerned; and it is the only means of using either.

By literature I mean what men have written about themselves and their fellows with emphasis rather on truth to life than on truth to fact. I mean to include all writings which stimulate the sympathies and the imagination, quicken the moral sensibilities, and cherish within us the ideal.

Now it is the power of literature to do these things, combined with our own power to substitute past or future for the present, which makes it possible to say that literature is life. For since literature is made up of picturings and events that are understandable to us and might have been our own, and since they, like our own, stir the feelings and the will, we may freely substitute for our own present any one of these moments, or a whole series of moments, that was once the present of some one else. So, for that moment or that series of moments, that literature has become our life. And it may so become our life an infinite number of times; and it may repeat this infinity of experience in the lives of all the souls in the universe—for aught that we know to the contrary. We may therefore justly say that literature is made up of living moments crystallized into immortal presentness. And we may feel, conversely, that anything which lacks this potential presentness,—which cannot under normal conditions displace wholly the present, is not literature. To be sure, the actual present must be not too interesting—some of our own moments we would not think of exchanging for any others; and a certain amount of inertia must be overcome—there is always a transition which takes conscious effort. But given a lull in our interests and a fair start in some one else's—which after all is often enough the program outside of our literary excursions—and we may fairly expect to find ourselves, on a half hour's notice, farthest north or shipwrecked in Bohemia.

This necessary and actual livableness of literature explains many things that are said about literature itself. For what other purpose or reason do we insist that fiction shall keep the truth of life, and leave, if need be, the facts of life,—that if the story really happened the novelist must usually make it over,—but because it must be so enlarged as to be a possible real experience for everyone who reads it? When we find an infidelity to the truth of life, which disturbs us more, its artistic insincerity, or the jolt back into our own dull present? When Stevenson says of romance that the “illusion” must be perfect, and “then we forget the characters; then we push the hero aside; then we plunge into the tale in our own person and bathe in fresh experience,”—what else does he mean but that the story must let us in to play the parts ourselves? And what we demand of novelist we demand also of poet, of essayist, of whoever writes to be read. First, of course, we insist that he be not so obscure that we cannot follow him,—that he shall not slip round sudden corners or through small holes in the fence or take prodigious leaps over brook or hedge so that we lose him. But we are not content to follow—we must be abreast; and presently,—for the perfect success of that piece of literature,—we have forgotten that another is there: these are our words and our thoughts, our reveries and our dreams. If we remember Keats as we read the “Ode on a Grecian Urn” or Wordsworth as we read “I wandered lonely as a cloud” and do not ourselves take the poet's place, we have scarcely approached understanding or appreciation; we are quite outside the garden, and merely looking at the name on the gate.

The significance of this cannot easily be overemphasized. When the man of letters comes to feel that in making literature he is in a very great and a very literal sense making life, we shall have greater literature. And when this idea penetrates the critic and reviewer, we shall have some readjustment of literary standards. Finally, when the reader, “gentle” or other, fully realizes that as he reads he becomes himself the author and the actors, we shall have more discriminating readers.

But all this carries within itself something else yet greater. For we may say not only that literature is life—that they who write are creators of life—and that we who read really live that life—but also that this form of life,—this stimulating of the sympathies and imagination and quickening of the moral sensibilities which we experience in literature,—that this is part of the highest and finest sort of living that we know. The “man of letters” may be so marked in public because he knows many books; but this distinction must mean, so far as it means anything admirable, that he has learned greatly to see and to live the life that is in them. This means, then, that he has learned to live more widely; and this means, in turn, that he has learned to live more highly, more greatly. For this learning has made him capable of taking as his own those ideas and ideals which the greatest men of all time have brought forth as the choicest fruit of their lives and left immortalized for us. It has made him strong to live his own life serenely, simply; it has made him capable of leaving his garden better tilled than he found it—of working out in his own place the hopes and fears that have been before him, and perhaps leaving one hope surer and one fear less fearsome.

But while the marked man of letters may do all this for himself and those who follow him in a more noticeable way than his fellows, he may do it no more greatly or permanently than many another whose path does not lead through “cloistered shades.” It is this splendid universality of the height and breadth of the life that is in literature which makes it mean something to all of us—for most of us are just the average sort; but every mother’s son of us can read Emerson of an evening and go to his next day’s work with a firmer faith in the balance of things in general and his things in particular; can read Wordsworth and get a half hour of pure joy out of the crocuses at his feet and the clouds overhead, that he has scarcely ever noticed before; can read Stevenson and during a dull or disagreeable ride in a crowd lose himself in a castle of gay thoughts, or help a timid little old lady across a hurly-burly street and go on with a yearning in his heart for all lonely mothers.

There is that in literature which opens widest to us the book of life, which answers its puzzles, which reads its riddles, and which gives heart to wait for the answers that do not come. There is stimulus of courage from those who were unafraid of the strange disappearings we call death; there is great push of impulse from stories of deeds done well. And the meaning of it all is simply this: that in literature all the great lives that have been lived wait for us to live them out again into our own small lives, that ours may have their narrow limits pushed out to take in the largest, and grow thence larger still.

DISSERTATION

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE BUSINESS MAN OF THE FUTURE.

HAROLD BIRDSALL PLATT.

Can business men of the coming generation keep pace with the growth of applied science? This is an unusual but I believe a rational form in which some of the many and pressing social questions of the day can be asked. Applied science has revolutionized modern economic conditions. Our captains of industry have recognized this in its outward aspects. Vast concentration of capital has replaced small units; as surely as small factories in their day replaced household industries. Have our old ideals of business morality proved adequate to our changed industrial life? A brief glance at our recent industrial history compels us to answer regretfully, but none the less positively, that they have not. The oppressions and abuses of monopolies; the mysteries of high finance; the struggles between capital and labor which at times become so severe as to threaten our courts; these are not things pleasant to look upon. Why then have they occurred?

Are our business men more depraved, less honorable than in the good old times; have our workingmen become less lawabiding, more narrow than of old? If this were so who could support the movements now making toward economic reform. What then is the cause of the present day evils which seem at times to threaten our whole industrial system. Is it not simply this; new industrial conditions require a new standard of economic conduct. A code of business ethics, based on John Stuart Mill's Political Economy, cannot be a ready guide for all exigencies in Wall St. of the present day. This does not mean that a small business man is any more justified in doing wrong than a billion dollar corporation, but it does mean that certain acts harmless under old business conditions become cruel, oppressive, unjust under a changed industrial system. Under the régime of the classic economist, competition was an all sufficient regulative to safeguard the interests of a laborer, capitalist and consumers alike. It was both economically expedient and ethically just.—It was the means by which labor and capital were distributed where they were needed, and producers competed with each other to serve the public best. Changed industrial conditions required larger units of production—with the growth of business organization, competition became more and more a war to drive competitors from the field—this could not long survive and competition unchecked led to combination. Let us consider some of the changes wrought by the transition from the régime of classic competition.

In the case of labor, the code of conduct which many employers are now holding up as a model of virtue for their employees was eminently successful in former times. Let there be free competition among laborers, let each man work for what he is willing to receive; let there be no combination among laborers to interfere with the laws of free competition—such was the decision of a United States Court a century ago. This was perfectly right under the régime of competition. Each employer hired a few men; there were many employers in search of good laborers—under these conditions individual bargaining was possible and was fair to both. Under our modern factory conditions this is impossible: employees are hired by a wholesale process—one workingman more or less makes but little difference. A few employers looking for hundreds of men are not anxious for one man who has tried to use his power of competition to raise his wages. Labor Unions have come as a result of this; not the unprincipled organizations designed to hamper industry as many would call them, not the benevolent institutions to uplift the world as others would call them. They are merely the result of the tendency of the times towards concentration in labor as well as in capital.

Similarly under the classic competition the general public—the small investor, the consumer—was adequately protected by competition—state interference to aid them was unfair to capital and they did not need it. With the concentration of capital, competition has ceased to be an adequate safeguard; as a result of this has come state regulation—not the meddling desire of our rulers to hamper industry, as its opponents would call it, but merely the recognition of the fact that public as well as capital and labor must be organized in our present industrial system.

Labor, capital and the state all organized to protect their rights against each other; this warfare cannot continue any more than can a struggle between two great combinations. What then is to be the outcome of this? Must we return to the old conditions of competition and small industries—return to competition and laissez-faire; to do this state interference, more drastic than any form of regulation, must be called into play. Consolidation, the natural outgrowth of competition during the last century, must be checked, that competition may survive. This is equivalent to saying that in our law, our business, we have not been able to keep pace with the growth of applied science—we cannot change our standard of business conduct so we must check our material development. To cure the evils of large combinations, all of their benefits must be sacrificed.

To some extent this is right; better suffer some loss of material progress than give free rein to dishonesty, class feeling and other evils which are threatening our industrial life to-day. But are these evils necessary to our economic progress, or are they not due merely to the facts that a code of conduct efficient under the old régime is inadequate to our present day era of combination?

The time has long since passed when a few directors of a huge corporation can use the well worn phrase—"this is our own business—we will run it as we please"—which translated means we will put as much water into our stock as we like, and make as big profit as we can; we will keep prices high so as to further the interests of the trade (our own); we will resist any advance of wages which will hurt the profits of industry (our own). This does not mean that every corporation is unfair, every attack on them just. Our financiers have no monopoly of the habit of managing their affairs without regard to the rights of others. The great and crying need in America to-day is for men in all ranks of life who will recognize the fact that modern industry demands co-operation on a grand scale—that individual self interest has ceased to be an all-sufficient regulator of industry—men who will recognize it, act upon it and help adapt our commercial life to meet it—but to the business men especially, to the men who are building up our vast industrial system—who assemble the capital and laborers—to them especially comes the responsibility of meeting the changed conditions it involves.

To our medical and legal professions responsibility is the keynote; responsibility to the fellow-members of their craft; responsibility to their clients; to the state by whose right and protection they practice. In the same way the business man of the future must realize that his calling is one of responsibility; responsibility to his fellow business men; to his employees; to the public.

Unrestrained competition must give way to co-operation. An effort to drive a small competitor out of business or crush him must be regarded as dishonorable as is the taking of a patient from one physician by another.

To the laboring men too the business men owe a direct responsibility. These men have literally invested themselves in the industry; they have given their lives to building it up, and can do but little else. Have they no claims to consideration—beyond merely receiving market wages when it is convenient to hire them? True through their unions they sometimes make unreasonable demands, but is often only an answer to similar treatment received. The business man, by reason of his broader education and training should certainly be the first to show the responsibility to his fellow workers.

HARVARD, 1908—CLASS REPORT

To the general public, too, deprived of the benefits of free competition, there must be a feeling of responsibility—for is it not by their right alone that corporations exist and are protected?

To reconcile all of these conflicting interests in our modern complicated industrial system is a task to challenge the energy, the patriotism; the justice of any American. When our business men realize their responsibility to all concerned in our co-operative industrial civilization, then may we say, and not till then, that they have kept pace with the growth of applied science. Whether our material progress will aid our moral and social advancement or check it, depends on the answer to this question—are our business men willing to take the responsibilities our modern industrial progress has brought upon them?
